CARAVAN GUARDS WANTED

This should be an easy place to tell the difference between the two. The first is the "What are the chances that this kind of high-speed flight would take place?"—there's always the pretty high "What's the chance of a plane taking off?"—the second is the question of whether the plane would be able to take off. The second is the question of whether the plane would be able to take off. The second is the question of whether the plane would be able to take off.

These findings suggest that the effects of the intervention may be limited to the specific context of the intervention, and that the effects may not be generalizable to other contexts or populations. Further research is needed to explore the generalizability of the findings and to identify the factors that may influence the effectiveness of the intervention.
